It always amazes me when looking at independence patterns that when you learn them between two limbs cofortably and then try to work the same pattern out between two different limbs, it seems like starting from scratch.

One example which springs to mind is when you try to play a bass drum ostinato on a floor tom and do various syncopated patterns over the top. It is very pertinent to percussionists who often need to cover the tonal spectrum and create intresting patterns without the help of their hands. Check out the example in lesson 8 and watch out for the closed floor tom notes in example 2, created by playing into the drum with the stick and preventing its resonance. Try these with the foot ostinato as well. (Ex 4)
